THE BOSTON OUTRAGE.

We present to-day the Message of President Fillmore, sent into the Senate on Friday last, in response to Mr. Clay's Resolution; and we also give some further accounts of the Boston outrage. Quite an animated debate sprung up in the Senate, on the reception of the President's Message, a brief notice of which we copy to-day from the Baltimore Sun.

the question of Slavery is up; but he was rebuked the question of Slavery is up; out he was reduked now is that a challenge has passed, and that a duel by Mr. Clay in the most severe and pointed terms. has been agreed upon." Messrs. Cass, Dickinson, Mason, Butler, ad Badis much truth and force in the following remarks of the House between these gentlemen:

Mr. Mason on the occasion. We quote from the renorts of the Republic: Constitution. It was a part of the compact subscriwould take issue with the Senator from Kentucky on ing delectable scene followed: the question whether this law was executed or not. cution was concerned, was a dead letter. He had full belief in the declaration of the President that he would execute the law if he could. He considered, however, that the President had begun wrong. In the first case, when the Crafts escaped, the slaves were lost to their master because of the evasions, prevarications, delays, and equivocations of those whose duty it was to enforce the law and administer justice. It was the daty of the President immediately to have dismissed the marshal. The law, if it was to be enforced, must be executed with alacrity, zeal, and cordiality. It must be executed with a desire, on the part of the people among whom it is executed to have it carried out becauses is the law, and without any obstacles tion. In this case the party was arrested; time was given, properly, perhaps, to him for his defence; there was no place prepared to confine him, it being the intention to keep him in the court-room from Friday to Tuesday. How could his rescue have been prevented? The laws of Massachusetts prohibit the imprisonment of parties arrested under this law in the iails of that commonwealth. He thought it wrong to denounce the population of Boston, when, by the laws of Masachusetts, it is made a penal offence for any of that population to aid or abet in the arrest or imprisonment of the fugitive. The Senator from Kentucky was right in denouncing the conduct of those engaged in this open resistance, but he should have gone one step further and denounced the State of Massachusetts as false to her federal obligations.

In the Long case, which occurred at New York, the expenses amounted to nearly the value of the slave; besides, the claimant was subjected to several vexatious suits. He would respectfully call the at-

In the course of the debate Mr. Cass said:

"He concurred with the Senator from Kentucky in his condemnation of the late proceedings. He was no defender of the Administration, but he had the utmost confidence in believing that the President would do his duty. It the laws were defective he would population, according to the present census: vote to clothe him with full power to execute the law. He deprecated the remarks of the Senator from Virginia that this law could not, was not, and would not be executed. He considered that the Massachusetts laws obstructing the execution of this law ought to have been cleared off her statute books long ago. But whether they were repealed or not, they would not prevent the execution of the law. He considered the Senator from Virginia wrong in supposing that voluntary action by the people of the free States was necessary to a due execution of the law. He considered that Long's case was a great triumph of the law. If time were given the law would work smoothly. The waves could not be expected to subside at once. He alluded to the conduct of the miscreant Thompson, and said that if a member of Congress did in England what Thompson dtd in this count; y, he would be sent to Botany Bay.

Mr. Mason replied. He considered the reason why the law was not properly executed by the people of the North was, that they considered it odious; they considered it a law in which they had no hand in passing. Of the thirty Senators from the free States only three had voted for the law. These were the Senator from Pennslvania, (Mr. Sturgeon,) and the two Senators from Iowa."

The President is disposed in his Message to treat this outrage more as a surprise on the people of Boston, than any assent of theirs to its perpetration. He is loth to believe that they would stand quietly by and see the law and the Constitution trampled under foot in their midst. But he states distinctly that the attention of the Marshal had been called to the duty of hiring a house in which to confine fugitives; and though he does not attribute the escape or rescue of the fugitive to the want of a prison or place of confinement, he does not "see how the prisoner could have been safely and conveniently detained, during the adjournment of the hearing for some days. without such place of confinement." The Marshal, it is admitted, had not performed his duty even to this extent; and yet, a month or two since, soon after the Craft's case came off-or rather, after the Crafts had gone off quietly in the face of day-the President, through his Attorney General, sanctioned the conduct of the Marshal and retained him in office. But we have no disposition even to speak of palpable neglect or inefficiency on the part of the President. This is a question which rises infinitely above party. We give that high officer credit for his evident determination to enforce the law, and thus to meet the demands of public sentiment. We hope he will find a way to do it in Massachusetts. If Andrew Jackson were President, he would execute that law, if he had to do it at the head of the army and with the whole State of Massachusetts under martial law.

It is idle to deny the fact that Massachusetts is faithless to her obligations to the slave States and to sworn to support. It may be well enough to denounce Boston for the late outrage-she probably deserves all that may be said of her; but what shall we 64y of a sovereign State which denies the use of her aid in carrying out a law of the United States? So far as this law in relation to fugitive slaves is the right of secession.

DIED.

At his residence in Caswell county, on Friday the th inst., after a protracted illness of pneumonia, Dr. John Comer, aged about 60 years. Thus has the community in which he lived, been suddenly shrouded in gloom and melancholy, and with a numerous circle of relatives and friends, have to lament the loss of him, who is struck down by the shaft of death, and called away in the midst of an extended career of professional skill and usefulness; having been engaged in the practice of Medicine in the same community for more than 30 years, with an ardor, success, and a devotion so untiring that seldom fails to command the confidence and esteem of a grateful people; who have, during such a lapse of years, derived relief and comfort from his kindly and benevolent hand in time of affliction and distress. If there was any trait more prominent in his character, it was that sincere, cordial, unaffected simplicity of manner, and purity of purpose, by which he was governed in all his ntercourse with mankind. But alas! he has closed his eyes on the scenes of this world; and of the high estimalife, the affecting, agonizing scene exhibted at his funeral circle, does this sad visitation fall heavily; and a devoted widow, and four affectionate daughters, are left to mourn their irreparable loss, and the public a kind benefactor.

Milton Chronicle. In Wake County, on the 23d instant, aged about 56 years, Mrs. Martha Weathers. The deceased had been member of the Baptist Church for a number of years. She bore her illness with patience and resignation, and a large circle of relatives and friends to mourn the irreparable loss occasioned by her death. At New Orleans, on the 3d inst., in the 50th year of his age, at the residence of his brother, Col. T. F. Hunt, U. S. Army, John Hunt, Esq., a native of Huntsville, in Near Quincy, Florida, on the 4th instant, Mr. Henry
